

The Global Health Program at the SDSU Graduate School of Public Health presents

Reengineering Aid: A Bold Agenda for the 21st Century

by Sir Richard Feachem, Director of the UCSF Global Health Group

Sir Richard will summarize the history of development assistance over the past 60 years, the evidence on aid effectiveness, and the current controversies surrounding such aid. He will position this debate in the context of the global financial crisis and the strenuous deficit reduction measures ongoing in most donor countries. Finally, Sir Richard will propose some building blocks for a new aid model, more suited to the geopolitical and economic realities of the 21st century.

This presentation is part of the Global Health Symposium Series at San Diego State University, and is open to the public.
